I understand that you are investigating the competition implications of one cinema company owning both cinemas in Bury St Edmunds.

The programmes for both outlets have been varied between each other and, as a regular visitor to The Picturehouse to see a range of shows which would not be shown at the multiplex, I can assure you that a high level of competition exists between the two outlets.

As pensioners, there is no way my wife and I would submit ourselves to the overloud outpouring of rubbish in the multiplex and prefer the varied choice at the smaller Picturehouse.

Doug Harris.

PS. Your remedies exclude the obvious one. When Picturehouses were acquired by Cineworld, the purchaser gave an undertaking that the programmes would be competitive and varied from each other. In Bury St Edmunds this undertaking has been scrupulously observed. The showings in The Picturehouse have differed and competed with those of its multiplex stablemate. Until this promise is broken, the most sensible 'remedy' would be for YOU to leave well alone.
